Re: Patient Support Advocate

Dear Hiring Team,

Patient Support Advocate is about steady, accurate execution on the phone and in the system, not strategy. I've already done the hard part of that twice: four years of heavy-volume outbound calling where I got good enough to keep a team of sales reps' calendars full every week, and a decade since where account accuracy was never optional. Most people applying here are hoping they'll be good at this. I already know I am.

At Senior Directory I prospected and qualified leads by phone for four years, booking appointments and keeping a steady flow of sales-ready meetings, the same discipline this role asks for on calls to programs and payers. At Birdeye, I sold and supported a reseller network that included agencies focused on healthcare clients, real exposure to how healthcare-adjacent businesses operate, though from the marketing-technology side rather than claims or EMR work directly. Across every role since, keeping client records accurate across CRM systems has been part of the job, and I don't let bad data slip by.

My last few years have been in more strategic, ownership-level roles, running my own company, in fact. What draws me to this one is more personal: I've been a patient inside this system myself, and I know what it means to have someone competent and attentive handling the process for you. That's the standard I'd hold myself to here. I'll be direct about the rest: you'd be getting someone who's already better at this than the job requires. I'd welcome the conversation.

Sincerely,

Joshua Rotenberg
